1. In the second story of the command building at the Hajmáskér camp are Soviet and Hungarian headquarters. The Soviet camp commander is General Rokovsky, about 50 years old of medium height, and a guardsman. His staff is small, and has a Hungarian lieutenant as a translator.
2. There are no Soviet troops in the camp, only some small technical groups who are occupied with proving weapons and the training of Hungarian formations.
3. There is a large Soviet tank park at the southern edge of the camp, between the road and railroad. It has a guard company of 80 to 85 men commanded by a captain. The company is changed every two months and its men are allowed no communication with the Hungarian troops.
4. There are at least 360 to 400 tanks in the park, of various types, but mostly T-34s. There are also a large number of armored cars, partly fully wheeled, partly half-tracks. Tanks are loaned from the park to Hungarian formations for training. The tanks stand in the open without protection.
5. Trials with modern armor and explosives are carried on at the camp all year long. Among others there have been experiments with a tank which can remain under water for as much as two hours. The personnel manning them wear masks with oxygen tanks at the back. There are also remote-controlled small tanks, filled with explosives, somewhat like those used toward the end of World War II by the Germans. The explosive used is a new and secret compound.

7. The whole camp is surrounded by barbed wire, three m high, with the top wire electrified. There are four watchtowers with powerful searchlights, always turned on at night. Guards are posted 25 m apart around the camp, and Hungarian patrols continually circulate around the place.
8. The camp is often visited by Hungarian Party functionaries from Budapest, who hold political meetings.
9. In the camp there are stationed at present part of a Hungarian corps command; a Hungarian division command; two armored regiments; a motorized rifle regiment; a field artillery regiment; an engineer regiment; an AAA section; and a staff officers' school. The motorized infantry formation furnishes the camp guards.
10. The AAA section is armed with Hungarian 37 mm guns for the most part, but also has a few Swedish Bofors.
11. Food at the camp is short and poor. Morning and evening it consists of bread and soup only, and the quality of the bread is poor. There is meat for almost every noon meal, but very little of it.
